A PROPOSED RAILROAD.

The proposed new railroad from Denver into Middle Park and on down the White or Yampah valleys, and so to Salt Lake or San Francisco would be a good thing for Denver, but there is no reason why it should meet with an enthusiastic approval from the rest of the State. So far as through travel is concerned Colorado has already as many direct lines as public necessity demands, and the building of a new one would not be to provide for the necessities of trade, but to unnecessarily multiply competition and diminish the earning capacity of those already built. The Rio Grande has on its main line two expensive tunnels, one at Tennessee Pass and the other in Cottonwood canon, just this side of Glenwood, and the Midland is just completing a great [illegible] through the Continental divide. These gateways will be ample for all transcontinental traffic for many years to come, and the construction of another great tunnel through the mountains directly west of Denver will only serve to advance the interests of selfish merchants who are determined that no dollar of trade that can be brought to Denver shall be permitted to contribute to the prosperity of any other city in the State.

For many miles to the west of Denver the country is not such as to afford any considerable amount of local traffic. Even the much-talked-of Middle Park is a mountain walled region which is too high for profitable agriculture, and which will always remain sparsely settled. As for the White and Yampah river valleys no one can doubt their fertility and natural resources. They are a second question among the richest parts of the State. But they are naturally tributary to the cities which are being built up in the western part of the State, and not to greedy Denver. They can be far more cheaply and conveniently reached by branch lines of the Rio Grande or the Midland, passing for their entire distance through rich valleys, than by an expensive and long line down and through the mountains from Denver. It is certain that as soon as the [illegible] the investment, these branch lines, so long projected, will be built, and in the meantime the investment of money in such a scheme as that now proposed is almost certain to end in financial ruin to all concerned.

If Denver capitalists wish to spend their money to the injury of Colorado Springs, Pueblo, Leadville, Glenwood and Grand Junction, they have a perfect right to do so, but they should not expect the sympathy of the rest of the State in so doing, and they should not present it to strangers as a money making opportunity, or anything else than exactly what it is.

THE PRESS CONGRESS.

The second of the great World's Congresses, to be held in connection with the Columbian Exposition, is now in session at Chicago. The place of the women who met in the Columbus and Washington Halls and the minor assembly rooms last week is now taken by newspaper men and women from all countries of the earth where the printing press is in use. The programme includes almost every department of newspaper work, and distinguished representatives of American and European newspapers will give public addresses. The object of the Press Congress as expressed by the official bulletin is "to provide for a proper presentation of the work and influence of the public press, in appropriate congresses in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition of 1893; to bring the most active and potent agencies of public opinion into more harmonious and useful relations, and as far as may be practicable to enable the attending people to see and hear the attending masters of journalism."

Among the subjects proposed for consideration at the Congress are the following: The relations of the public press to modern civilization; the origin, nature and development of the modern newspaper; the relation of the public press to current events; the distinguishing characteristics of the public press of different countries; the [illegible] errors and mistakes, and the reparation of injuries inflicted on innocent persons; the public press as the advocate of human rights and the champion of the interests of the common people; the liberty of the press from the standpoint of law and progress, and its bearings on civilization; the publication of a newspaper a public trust, and as such its rights, duties and responsibilities; the press as an agency of commerce and a factor in the production and exchange of commodities; the relation of the press to political life and power; the distinctive ethics of journalism; the relations of the press to education and to moral and economic reforms; the art of news gathering and the office of editorial comment, independently and in their relations to each other; the essential departments of the daily and weekly press, and the proper field for the magazine; the press in its relations to international affairs and the great interests common to humanity; the public press and the value of organization in its operations; the public press and the improvements in the structures occupied by it; the public press and the improvements in machinery and appliances used in connection therewith; the public press and the improvements in the business methods in connection therewith.

The religious and weekly press have not been overlooked, and their features and possibilities will form the subjects of numerous essays. Leading representatives of modern journalism will discuss the broader aspects of the subject, and distinguished foreigners will present the matter as it appears to them. Among the latter will be M. de Blowitz of Paris, the famous political correspondent; James Bridge, delegate from Great Britain; Marquis de Chasseloup-Laubat, delegate from France; Dr. Stephen Wantzaff, delegate from Germany; [illegible] Grandduke Alexander from Russia; Dr. Adolfo Bu, delegate from Venezuela; Dr. Carlos R. Gallardo, delegate from Argentine Republic; Captain Ad. P. Ingham, delegate from Brazil; and Professor Dimschin, delegate from Russia.

An interesting experiment is to be tried in the appointment of army officers to act as Indian agents. Upon the request of Secretary Smith of the Interior department, the Secretary of War has furnished a list of officers available for this service, and it is announced that the policy of the government will be to place an army officer in charge of all the agencies, except where the Indians have reached an advanced stage of civilization. There is a great deal that might be said both for and against the proposed change. Perhaps the most serious objection to the old system is that the Interior department has not at its disposal a force sufficient to enforce obedience to its regulations. In case of trouble it is necessary to call on another department of the government, and this division of authority gives rise to complications and tends to lessen the respect of the Indians for their agents. The new experiment appears to be one worth trying, and the results will be awaited with considerable interest by all who are concerned with the vexed question of Indian management.

The Forestry Division of the Agricultural department has issued a new circular calling attention of lumbermen, miners and others to the necessity of avoiding waste in cutting timber, and to the advisability of precautions against forest fires. The circular also embodies a draft of a proposed law for forest preservation and management. While it is probable that no plan would meet the approval even of all advocates of forest management as opposed to forest waste, yet there is such great and pressing need of some law on the subject that it is better to get some system into operation even if it is not altogether what might be desired rather than to let matters run along as they are now doing. Changes and improvements can easily be made at a later date and they can be made all the better for the experience that will then have been acquired.

ART OF MAKING A SHOW.

American and Foreign Methods at the World's Fair.

World's Fair, May 22.—[Special.]—In going through the exposition one finds himself more interested at first in noting how the various exhibits are installed than he is in the exhibits themselves. People who attended the Paris show four years ago say the installation here is superior in the respects to that witnessed in the French capital. It has long been a tradition that American manufacturers and merchants do not know how to install exhibits in a great exposition. This may have been true years ago, but every one who has kept his eyes open must have noticed the wonderful progress that has been made in this country in the attractive arrangement of show windows. Even in the smaller cities and towns you will see shop windows in which both taste and originality have been expended upon the displays. In the larger cities there are professional show-window experts who, through the process of the keen competition, have brought the general standard very much higher than it ever was before. The foreign shops cannot vie with ours in the beauty or interest of their street shows.

Well, this exposition is simply an international show window on a tremendous scale. It is a series of "fronts" in which all the world has displayed its best in the most attractive manner possible; and it may be said in truth that Americans do not suffer in the comparison. It is in the main building that the displays are most pretentious than anywhere else. Here the most money has been expended in pavilions and ornamentation. At first glance the visitor is disappointed in the American part of the show. As he approaches the center of the monster enclosure—where the clock tower is—he finds three lines of grandeur and beauty, and one which starts out impossibly but soon dwindles into comparative insignificance. The three beautiful lines are those aisles or avenues which are flanked by the foreign exhibits, while the last is the right side of the north avenue, where the American exhibitors are.

Before passing judgment one must stop to consider that the immense pavilions which adorn the foreign sections were erected by the governments of the exhibiting countries. Each of the countries has taken the space allotted to it, erected a costly facade and extensive structure, and then subdivided the space among firms or institutions which in turn have added their contributions to the general effect. Thus the German government has spent probably a quarter of a million of dollars in the construction of their noble pavilion. It is very rich and imposing, and is of itself an exposition building of great size and rare beauty. The French government has expended, on the opposite corner of the central space, almost as large a sum. They have not only spent a great deal of money but have taken much time to the development of their plans, so that as I write the workmen are still thick upon the vast structure and not more than half the exhibits are in place. Other governments, England excepted, have worked on a similar basis, and of course they all make a magnificent showing.

In a United States section of the building the government has done nothing. The federal money and energy have been expended in the government building just to the north, which is one of the most fascinating displays to be seen within the [illegible] and other outdoor exhibits. Within the main building America is represented altogether by firms and corporations. Therefore we find facing the costly pavilions of the French, the Germans, the Austrians and the Japanese such structures as individual enterprise and liberality could afford to erect. It follows as a matter of course that the foreign sections are much more imposing and magnificent. One would not expect American firms to compete with foreign governments which have had hundreds of thousands of dollars at command, with private effort to support them.

So far as the frontage of the four sections of the vast hall is concerned the American section shows up very well, notwithstanding. Three or four firms, holding the post of honor in the American quarter, have erected pavilions which compare well with those of the foreign governments near by. In the opinion of many visitors the most beautiful pavilion in the palace is that which stands as a sort of center piece to the United States section. Though it cost probably no more than one-fifth as much money as the rivals across the way, it is more symmetrical than the German structure, and more pleasing in color and form than the French. In perfection of coloring and decoration, both outside and in, it is by all odds the most notable thing here. Its ceiling and walls are already attracting thousands of visitors daily, and many of these are foreigners who readily yield the palm to Americans in interior decoration.

Contrasting the [illegible] adopted by the Americans and English, neither of whom have been assisted here by government appropriations, the writers are far ahead. The English section is much like a series of English shops. In buildings rather plain and unpretentious, its show cases quietly rich but not remarkable, may be found some of the most glorious products of the handiwork of man. The English is characteristic of them. They depend solely upon the merits of their wares. They make no attempt at spectacularism in panels or show windows, and do not appear to possess any art in the arrangement of the articles which they have to show.

There are many striking contrasts here. The dissimilarity between the methods employed by the English and that child Europe an nations [illegible] The American [illegible] section. In the United States section you will quickly perceive that the Yankee is here, that American originality and cuteness have had full sway. That artful arrangement of wares into novel forms catch the eye at every turn, and that many of the pavilions are of a sensational character.

FIG. AS A COUNTRY SCHOOL HOUSE.

While the English lumber is tediously simple and almost plain, and the Continental foreigner endeavors to mix architectural effects, statuary and hangings with his wares—to show the products of his factories in miniature palaces—the American sticks much closer to the thing which he has to show. It is that and not some allied art that he seeks to glorify. The average American does not pretend to a knowledge of archæology, or of statuary, or of paintings, or of tapestries; and he declines to admit that his wares need any such embellishment to make them attractive. On the other hand, he replaces the simplicity of his British cousins by deft manipulation of his goods, so that even the most commonplace of exhibits are made sensational. Some of these efforts are surprising.

For instance, you would not think there was anything attractive about a cook stove, would you? It is, though one of the most useful of mans fabrications, one of the most commonplace. But the case wears a different aspect when the exhibitor—apparently saying to himself, "the stove's the thing and the stove it shall be,"—makes a stove of perfect detail and proportions as big as a country school house, puts electric lights in it to illuminate the letters which denote its name, and asks visitors to step within the stove which is in itself a pavilion and see what he has to show them. This is sensationalism, it is true, and it savors of advertising methods, but it is distinctively American. Besides, what is the exposition, anyway, but an advertising show-window of the nations?

Another American manufacturer builds an immense trunk, just like any overgrown trunk, except that its walls are of glass. This is his pavilion, and within it he displays his [illegible] [illegible] fashionable.—It [illegible] a couple of corsets.—Made by George Frost Co., Boston.—For sale by

A fine quality of [illegible] Paris.

One American manufacturer of such exceedingly commonplace articles as enamelled iron preserve kettles, milk pails, frying pans, dippers, cups, cans, buckets and such things in a pagoda-like form that luxuriously accents the attention of every passer-by. A thousand wares was displayed on shelves not one visible in a thousand would stop to look at it. A New England maker of razors has an installation here that is a thing of beauty. He not only shows something less than a million styles of razors, but groups together the blades with which our revolutionary forefathers kept their faces clean, then shows the style in use from 1840 to 1850, and by successive chronological stages up to the present day. Another New England firm compels you to stop in admiration of its display of files. Perhaps you never used a file in your life. At any rate you never supposed there were more than a dozen or two kinds of files. He has his ware so arranged so skillfully you see at a glance there are ten thousand kinds. Many of them are really beautiful because of such perfect workmanship and adaptability to the purpose for which intended—the sort of utility that approaches the field of art. One file is about three feet long, and a strong man would be required to wield it. Lying upon it is another one bigger than a needle, yet just as perfect.

How smart these New Englanders are! Here is another who actually faces notes you with a display of tacks. Crowded further and further out of business and sledges have come to stay. Not an exhibit of hoes, rakes, pitchforks and shovels is so artfully contrived that you pause in amazement. The Yankee lock maker arrests your attention with a padlock as big as the end of a street car. It is a perfect padlock, except that its sides are transparent, making it a mere show case in which are a thousand types of locks.

[illegible] a pavilion which is as pretty as a picture, and what else do you suppose it was? Steel wire rope and cable manufacturers in the world—an American house—charms you with a display of steel cables ranging in size from the knitting needles to the mammoth mass, thicker than a fat man's body, which is one of the cables of the Brooklyn bridge. And for a sort of emphasis there is a handsome panorama of the Brooklyn bridge, with a model of a ship in the foreground, every inch of its rigging being composed of steel wire.

The exhibit of a few of a thousand similar artful arrangements of the products of American shops. There is not only solid merit in all the wares, but an originality and a finish peculiarly American, and with which the foreigners are unable to compete. The general effect is to make the visitor proud of his countrymen, of their skill in manufacture and their ingenuity in invention.
